

How do organizations respond when they finally achieve their purpose that they have been striving to achieve for a long time? I explore this question through a qualitative inductive study of a Jewish Service Organization that believes that it has achieved its sole purpose of “resettling Jewish refugees to the United States”. I explore the process of how this organization responded to achieving its purpose by helping Muslim Afghan refugees escape Taliban rule in Afghanistan and resettle in the United States.